Answer:

Legend:

In the 1820s, the Bavarian astronomer Franz Von Paula Gruithuisen claimed to have glimpsed entire cities on the moon with his telescope. He wrote that the 'lunarians who lived there had built sophisticated buildings, roads and forts. Most of his colleagues scoffed at his assertion, but he eventually got a small lunar crater named after him.

Sir William Herschel, a prominent British astronomer and composer, also thought aliens lived on the moon and made regular observations about the progress of their construction projects. In 1835, when the New York Sun published a series of fraudulent articles about the supposed existence of life on earth on the moon (pulling off the so-called "Great Moon Hoax"), it falsely credited Herschel's son John, a famous astronomer in his own right, with the shocking discovery.

Special names of the moon in different languages:

- Sanskrit: Himanshu
- Marathi: Chandra ;

The poet John Lea is comparing the silver house in the sky to a moon. He describes the different phases of the moon as the time to build up and pull down the said 'Silver House'.

The poet talks about a man that lives in the 'Silver House' and how no one knows or talks about the man. The poet further advises us to draw the window blind at night, before calling it a day, in order to see the lonely man. John Lea, the poet, states that if you cease to find the poor man in the sky, it is because the 'Silver House' has been taken down. The 'Silver House' will of course not be there due to the moon being in the 'new moon' phase.
